Re: John W. Elenbaas, Jr.

On December 26, 1967, Sergeant [redacted] United States Army, assigned to the Casualty Division, Adjutant General's Office, Department of the Army, Tempo B., Second and R Streets, S.W., Washington, D.C., advised that at approximately 1:45 p.m. this date he accepted a long distance telephone call from a man identifying himself as John Elenbaas, the father of Jack Elenbaas, a soldier killed in Vietnam. Prior to accepting the call, [redacted] determined through the long distance operator that the caller was inquiring about his son who was killed in action.

Sergeant [redacted] said that it is standard operating procedure to accept such calls as his unit handles all aspects of war deaths and as such frequently receives inquiries from the next of kin.

During the telephone conversation, Elenbaas inquired whether he was entitled to transportation to Vietnam. He told the Sergeant that Governor George Romney was then in the war zone for the purpose of "getting votes." He said that Romney, and people like him, are using the Vietnam war for this purpose and that this situation bothers him since his son was killed there. He said that he cannot sleep because of this situation and that he will not be able to do so until he "takes a gun to them." He told the Sergeant that he wants to go to Vietnam and "shoot the son-of-a-bitch."

When Sergeant [redacted] told Elenbaas that he was not entitled to Government transportation, Elenbaas said that he would wait until Romney gets home, implying that he would kill him then.

The telephone conversation with Elenbaas was extremely difficult to follow and understand because Elenbaas sobbed throughout and repeatedly changed his train of thought.
